A New Sahidic Fragment of the Gospel of Luke from the Michigan Collection

Brice C. Jones
Montreal

Abstract
This article publishes for the first time the extant remains of a Sahidic Coptic manuscript containing portions of Luke 17-19. Almost all of the special Lukan pericope concerning Jesus and Zacchaeus is preserved (19:1-10), as well as most of the parable of the Dishonest Judge (18:1-8). The edition includes a transcription, translation, palaeographical analysis, critical apparatus, as well as images of the fragment.

Introduction
I present here P. Mich. inv. 546, a previously unpublished Sahidic fragment of the Gospel of Luke housed in the University of Michigan Papyrology Collection.1 The fragment is among a batch of papyri that was purchased in the early 1920s by Dr. David L. Askren for Prof. Francis Kelsey of Michigan. The Gospel of Luke is preserved complete in Sahidic Coptic in P.Palau Rib. Inv.-Nr. 181 (sa 1 according to the Liste der Koptischen Handschriften des Neuen Testament),2 which was published by Quecke in 1977.³ Quecke recorded the variants of the Pierpont Morgan manuscript M 569 (sa 9), which preserves all four Gospels, although Luke has not been formally edited.

The text of our fragment is written in brown ink on light-colored parchment measuring 14.3 x 6.4 cm and contains portions of Luke 17:35-18:4 on the hair side, and Luke 19:3-10 on the flesh side;⁴ hair and flesh are distinguishable by color. Only portions of the left and right margins are preserved. The archaeological provenance of the fragment remains unknown.⁵ There are approximately 105-110 lines missing between hair and flesh, which suggests that there were originally two parallel columns of text. Preserved in this fragment are 18 lines of the first column on the hair side, and 19 lines of the second column on the flesh side. Each reconstructed line averages around 24-25 letters and so each column would likely have originally contained close to 40 lines. The original dimensions of this codex would therefore be quite large; I estimate around 30 × 26 cm, excluding margins. Due to the spacing at the top of this fragment on both recto and verso, it is clear that the fragment constitutes the upper portion of a folio of a codex; the first lines of both extant columns on hair and flesh sides are present. No pagination has been preserved.

The script is Coptic uncial or bimodular and roughly bilinear. Features of decoration include circlets, especially with ∆, κ, τ and ξ, and points on the ends of most letters. There is one occurrence of an enlarged initial letter in “ekthesis” at the beginning of Luke 18:1 (ⲁⲧⲱ υ ϋ). e and ο are very narrow. ό is only moderately round, and its hasta is tall. γ has lost its vertical stroke. In most occurrences, the scribe writes supralinear strokes of the “connective” type as a dot. Logical punctuation is present. In view of the difficulties in dating Coptic manuscripts, I have followed others in not assigning a date.⁶

⁴ In the APIS description of P.Mich. inv. 546 (michigan.apis.5258), it is noted that a smaller fragment may belong to the leaf edited here. However, Prof. Verhoogt examined this smaller fragment on my behalf and determined that it is not related on account of the differences in the composition of ink (carbon vs. iron based) and the ducctus and spacing.

The correspondence between our Coptic text and the Greek New Testament is close. Following the majority of Greek and Coptic manuscripts, our fragment omits Luke 17:36, which some scribes added to their manuscripts (D f 700 lat sy) by assimilation to Matthew 24:40. The following differences may be noted. The Coptic clarifies the Greek reading ἐπὶ χρόνον in 18:4 by adding ὅγιος (“a long [lit. great] time”). The (restored) Coptic translates the Greek word συκομορέα (“sycamore tree”) with ὅβῳ ἰ建档立 (“fig tree”) in Luke 19:4. μῦτε is the standard translation of συκέα, as in Luke 13:6, but Coptic also uses it to render συκομορέα. In 19:6, the Coptic text has omitted the two occurrences of the Greek conjunction καί, but this does not necessarily mean that the Vorlage of the Coptic translator did not contain them. E. Perttilä has demonstrated that asyndeton is very common in Coptic texts, and that “[t]o read the Greek behind the Coptic text is in the case of conjunctions mostly impossible.”

7 Codex D does something similar by adding the indefinite τοά (“a certain time”).
Luke 17:35–18:4 (Hair):

35 “...grinding grain together. One will be taken and the other left behind.”

37 And they answered him, “Where, Lord?” And he said to them, “The place where the body (σῶμα) will be the vultures (ἀετός) will gather.” 18:1 He told them a parable (παραβολή) concerning their need to pray always and not to become tired (ἐγκακέω), saying, “There was a judge (κριτής) in a city (πόλις) who did not fear God or have respect...”
Luke 19:3-10 (Flesh)

3 ... he was not able on account of the crowd because he was small in his stature.
4 So he ran forward and climbed upon a fig tree so that he might see him because he was coming by that place.
5 And he came there. Jesus lifted up his eyes and said to him, “Zacchaeus, hurry up and come down. For it is necessary that I go into your house today.”
6 He hastened, came down [and] received him, rejoicing.
7 And all saw and murmured saying, “He came and lodged with a sinful man.”
8 But Zacchaeus stood up and said to the Lord, “Behold, I give, Lord, half of my belongings (ὑπαρχόντα) to the poor, and that which I have defrauded anyone of anything, I will give back fourfold.”
9 Jesus said to him, “Salvation has come to this house today, because he is also a son of Abraham.
10 For the Son of Man ...”

Critical Apparatus

The following brief apparatus excludes orthographical variants and records only those variants of special interest. For convenience, restorations of lacunae and word division are based on Horner unless otherwise noted. The fragments are collated against the following texts:

sa 1 = Hans Quecke’s edition of P.Palau Rib. Inv.-Nr. 181.
sa 9 = Pierpont Morgan Manuscript M 569, readings of which are found in Quecke, Das Lukasevangelium saïdisch.
